Soc.women

I have trouble with confrontation so I would probably avoid adressing the issue for as long as possible.
I would initiate conversations with the women, document our conversations as much as possible and add them in the platforms related to our group/space.

Who has the control of the site? That's what matters.

If I would have faith on the admins I would tell them that they are suuuper annoying and childish and we can also make an other site and they can have that one to play.

Most of the times you try many different possible responses. You fail and try again. Code of conducts, confrontations...

As a user you shoudn't do the moderator's work. If you are there just to give your opinion.
Code of conduct?

If the group that made the platform doesn't care, then who would?
It needs some caring from the moderator
All the members can intervene referring back to the code of conduct

Who makes the group in the end. Community that really cares they will put more effort on code of conducts

Some communities think that it is your responsibility as a newcomer to follow the code of conduct.
Some cases its a formal organisation, in the structure its mandatory to have meetings to discuss these issues.
In the structure it is mandatory to discuss these rules.

Switching responsibilities
Switch roles, sometimes you also become a moderator, to understand how difficult is this.
